“ My son was not a saint, and I will never pretend he was. He was human. He made mistakes, he faced struggles, and too often he was failed by a system that should have protected and helped him. But he was so much more than the circumstances that surrounded him.

He was loved deeply, and he knew how to love deeply in return. That is how I will always remember him—not for the battles he fought, but for the heart he carried. He could make people laugh, make them feel seen, and remind those who loved him that even in darkness, love still exists.

From the day he was born, he was attached to my hip, my shadow, my boy. No matter how old he became, he was always my son, and he always will be. Death may have taken him from my sight, but it can never take him from my heart.

Our faith tells us that love does not end when life on earth does. It lives on. It transcends. It waits for us beyond this world. Because of that faith, I hold on to the hope that this goodbye is not forever.

To my son: you were loved beyond measure, and you will be missed beyond words. I carry you with me every day, in every memory, every prayer, and every beat of my heart.

Love you forever, my boy. Until we meet again.
